

Fujinomiya Trail

Standard time required Up: 5 hours, Down: 3.5 hours Distance Up: 5km, Down: 5 km

Fujinomiya fifth Station (2390 m) ▶▶▶ Sengen-taisha Okumiya Shrine (3715m)

The elevation of its fifth Station is the highest, and the climbing distance is the shortest among the four trails. The goal is the closest to Kengamine Peak.

Prince Route
The course from the sixth station of the Fujinomiya Trail to Mount Hiei and then to the Gotemba Trail is generally called the Prince Route. The course became popular when the Crown Prince of Japan climbed Mount Fuji for the first time in 2008.

The Fujinomiya Trail is on the southern face of Mount Fuji with a shorter walking distance and a smaller difference in elevation. Although it's short, the trail is also steep. It's the most popular next to the Yoshida Trail because of the short distance. What is different from the other trails, however, is that it doesn't have a descending-only trail; therefore, you need to walk on the same path when both climbing up and down. The trail not only is popular and has many climbers, but also could be highly congested at peak times. Although the time normally required is short, you need to make a plan with enough time taking congestion into consideration.

The elevation of the fifth station is 2,390 m. Instead of starting to climb right away, take time to acclimate yourself to the elevation to prevent altitude illness. First, you walk along a black sand and gravel path, and then a rocky trail after the seventh station. There also is the Mt. Fuji Health Center at the eighth station. After this, the slope becomes steeper, so you need to walk carefully. One of the reasons that the Fujinomiya Trail is popular is that its summit is the closest to Kengamine Peak, which is the highest point of Mount Fuji. On the summit, there are Sengen-taisha Okumiya Shrine and a seasonally open post office as well.
